Short Description

Contemporary social and environmental challenges call for a rethinking of the forms and models of the business corporation. The field of management research has focused a lot on how to curb corporate behavior and how stakeholders matter. But it has usually considered as given for entrepreneurs the possible forms, the governance and the legal constitution of the firm, while the diversity of corporate models is continually expanded both by companies and by laws. This topic encourages work that examines our current theories of the corporation, extends our knowledge on alternative and emergent forms of business companies, and suggests new foundations for future governance.

Long Description

In the field of management research, there is a growing awareness of both the need and the opportunities to rethink business corporations in line with social and sustainability issues:

- Management scholars increasingly question the capacity of business companies, within existing laws and governance standards, to take into account the interests of their stakeholders and to contribute to the general welfare.
- At the same time, entrepreneurs are more and more eager to develop new business practices and business forms that embrace a broader agenda: e.g. mission and purpose enhancement, social enterprise, hybrid organizations, impact investing, shareholder engagement. In a number of states, corporate law also introduces new corporate forms (such as Benefit Corporations).

These contemporary movements challenge the traditional business forms and call for a rethinking of corporate models. This track will encourage research work that examines our current theories of the corporation, extends our knowledge on alternative and emergent forms of business companies, and suggests new foundations for governance for the public interest. This implies also innovative theories of organizations and a new view from management on legal issues. The track will welcome management research that analyzes the legal foundations of the firm, their adequacy with contemporary issues, and their possible reforms.

The broader aim of this EURAM track is to build a platform of research to discuss the models of the corporation and to explore new alternatives for the future. It will welcome contributions from various lines of research:

- History of business forms, governance doctrines and institutional frameworks;
- Cases and empirical evidence on alternative forms of business organizations (social enterprise, hybrid organizations, cooperatives, mission-driven companies);
- The role and impact of corporate, social and financial law, as well as the need and conditions for reforms;
- Emerging forms of collaboration between public and private organizations and between public or private organizations and social enterprises;
- Alternatives models of the firm and its governance, going beyond the splitting between for-profit and non-for-profit organizations, or meeting democratic or sustainable imperatives.

This track will overall explore how management sciences can contribute to rethink the forms and purposes of future business organizations. It will also open new avenues for collaboration between law & management.
